VOTING BY MAIL

Voting by mail is one way voters may participate in an election other than in-person at a voting location. This process is also called absentee voting in some communities. Each state has its own rules on who can vote by mail. Some states require an excuse to vote by mail, while other states automatically mail every registered voter a ballot before an election. Examples of excuses may include illness, injury, disability, traveling outside of your jurisdiction or locality on Election Day, being a college student, or serving in the military.

IN-PERSON VOTING

In-person voting typically takes place at a polling place on Election Day, but voters may have the option to vote before Election Day at a polling location, vote center, or elections office. Contact your local elections office for more information about upcoming election dates, polling hours, and in-person voting options.
